Spelling Words

In 1799, a French army officer named Pierre-Francois Bouchard was working near the city of Rosetta in Egypt. Bouchard and his men saw many ancient things, including a moddel of a house made of a mettal that looked like nikel. For fun, the men would juggil small stones. One day Bouchard found a stone slab that was different from the others. He was very gentil with it as he used water from a nearby barel to wash off the layers of dirt.

Bouchard saw strange symbols. The treuble was that he did not know what they meant. Bouchard took the stone to scholars. They all had to marvell at it, but they were unable to understand it. Was that a reddle or the titil of a play? Was the bird an eagel? Was that little creature a flying squerrel? More than 20 years passed before anyone could translate the Rosetta Stone.
